ABSTRACT

These 21 guides are intended for teachers, counselors, admissions officers and students. Each guide is one page long, and provides students with a range of occupations opened by the related academic subject. It introduces students to primary sources of career information and helps them develop life-long skills needed to make career choices by suggesting further readings. The guides rely heavily on the 1977 edition of the D.O.T. and "What Can I Be?" as sources. They are intended to be used with "21 Lesson Plans in Career Exploration" (ED 159 553). Career areas include business, humanities, natural sciences and social sciences. (Author/BEF)

To Personnel Workers and Teachers:

The 21 Guides to Choosing a Career enable you to make a counselee or student a partner in the career-choice process, and to help move him or her a step closer to choosing a college-level career.

After you have established which academic subject a counselee likes, or if you are a teacher conveying the career implications of your subject to your students, it is a simple matter to hand the counselee or student one of the single-sheet Guides which quickly lets him see the range of occupations opened to him by the subject.

The Guides cover four subjects in Business, six in the Humanities, four in the Natural Sciences, and seven in the Social Sciences.

Each occupational title listed in a Guide is accompanied by the 9-digit code specified in the Dictionary of Occupational Titles. The code number makes it easy for a person to find any occupation of interest to him in numerical sequence in the D.O.T. Due to the structure of the 1977 Edition of the D.O.T., the reader can readily learn about a number of jobs that are congruent with his abilities and interests and about career ladders that provide a path for upward mobility for his abilities.

The Guides introduce the student or counselee to several of the primary sources of career information. The primary sources help people understand the nature of authentic career information, and some of the important factors in making career choices, such as: setting an objective but with flexibility; considering one's interests, abilities, and aspirations; and giving attention to the work conditions, earnings and employment outlook for an occupation.

Another primary source given in the Guides, What Can I Be? 525 Liberal Arts and Business Careers, enables a counselee to consider with respect to each of 525 occupations: his academic interests; his abilities dealing with data, people and things; his aspiration level; and the possibility of his securing up-to-date career information from professional societies and governmental agencies.

In using one or more of the Guides, a student or counselee can acquire some of the life-long skills he will need to make sound career choices.

A variety of personnel workers - counselors, career information specialists, college admissions officers, placement officers, academic advisors, social workers, and women's workers, among others, may find the Guides to be a practical aid in furthering the careers of the people they serve. Teachers can , through use of the Guides, infuse career education into the curriculum for their subjects with a minimum expenditure of time and effort.

Each of the 21 Guides has been correlated with a corresponding Lesson Plan in Career Exploration for teachers.

If you find an occupation you like, you can secure more information about it by consulting What Can I Be? 525 Liberal Arts and Business Careers. (1)

What Can I Be? permits you to see for each occupation:

Which subjects provide desirable preparation,
What levels of ability to deal with data, people and things are required,
How much education you must aspire to, and
Which professional societies provide authentic career information.

A list of other important kinds of information may be found on page 90 of What Can I Be?.

For many of the occupations, information is given about employment outlook, earnings and working conditions in the Occupational Outlook Handbook, 1978-79 Edition. (2)

Brief, authoritative descriptions of each occupation may be found in the Dictionary of Occupational Titles: Fourth Edition. (2) The 9-digit code numbers beside an occupation enable you to find it in numerical sequence in the Dictionary in the section Occupational Group Arrangement. (3)

If possible, you should verify your impressions of an occupation by speaking with a worker in it.

If you find an occupation you like, you can secure more information about it by consulting What Can I Be? 525 Liberal Arts and Business Careers. (3)

What Can I Be? permits you to see for each occupation selected by you:

Which subjects provide desirable preparation,
What levels of ability to deal with data, people and things are required,

How much education you must aspire to, and
which professional societies provide authentic career information.

A list of other important kinds of information may be found on page 90 of What Can I Be?.

For many of the occupations, information is given about employment outlook, earnings and working conditions in the Occupational Outlook Handbook, 1978-79 Edition. (4)

Brief, authoritative descriptions of each occupation may be found in the Dictionary of Occupational Titles: Fourth Edition. (4) The 9-digit code numbers beside an occupation enable you to find it in numerical sequence in the Dictionary in the section Occupational Group Arrangement. (5)

If possible, you should verify your impressions of an occupation by speaking with a worker in it.

(1) In WCIB? change Level of Ability Dealing with People to "High".

(2) "Term" indicates the occupation is defined in the section Term Titles and Definitions in the DOT.

(3) Martin M. Bruce, Ph. D., Publishers, Box 228, New Rochelle, N. Y. 10804.

(4) Superintendent of Documents, U. S. Government Printing Office, Washington, D. C. 20402.

(5) Disregard the occasional, minor differences between the occupational titles in WCIB? and the DOT.
